

alive with possibilities...

May 19, 2005

learn&grow

Do not be too timid and squeamish about your actions. All life is an experiment.
-- Ralph Waldo Emerson

JOIN THE CLUB
It's Your World...
Only Better!

ASK OUR EXPERTS

Got A Question
on life, love,
or SUCCESS?
Ask It!

WHAT'S YOUR HOROSCOPE

look great
and feel better
with Lean Routine!

TAKE OUR SURVEY

Do you balance your
checkbook:

Weekly
Monthly Never

Commitments vs. Resolutions

Which is Right for You?

I don't recall exactly when I resolved to give up resolutions. It was around the same time I realized that diets were quick fixes, and I had to change my thinking around food and exercise. Resolutions are quick fixes, too, something we can tell people to show them we're aware of the parts of ourselves that need improvement. I've learned that if I'm serious about growing as an individual, I need more than a pithy resolution: I need to make an ongoing commitment to myself.

My New Year's Eve tradition is to take a bubble bath (alone!) and think over the past year, observing but not judging. Then I sit and write in my journal: what were the high- and lowlights of the past 12 months? What did I do right, and what do I wish I'd done differently? What have I learned? Then the big one: what kind of person do I want to be, and where am I along that path? These notes give me my guidelines for the upcoming year. Not absolutes and Lent-like abstinence vows, but rather a gentle commitment to growth.

I've learned that "I'm going to quit smoking" doesn't work unless I work on myself enough to know why I smoke in the first place, and unless I'm willing to go through the pain that quitting entails. "I'm going to lose twenty pounds" is unrealistic if I'm only ten pounds overweight. And maybe I need to focus on learning to love my body no matter what it looks like, instead of spending so much energy hating it.

Perhaps the most important commitment I've made is the one that's replaced "I'm going to go on more dates this year." I'm not ready to be in the kind of relationship I want to have. I can visualize my ideal relationship, but I'm not yet the person who would attract my best partner. It's not that I'm a "loser-magnet", as so many of my single friends are quick to identify themselves; it's that I'm attracting people who aren't right for me. As much as I hate to admit it sometimes, my inner state is mirrored by the world and people around me.

Like the women of Sex and the City (albeit with a much lower-priced wardrobe), I don't know if I'll ever meet Mr. Right. Unlike those women, I don't know if I will ever lose those last ten pounds. What's important is my commitment

more Learn & Grow:

The Home of the Future

How to Get Wired

Get the Dish!

Hollywood Event Planner shares his secrets

Bad Credit Got You Down?

How to Get Out of Debt Now

Be a Savvy Consumer

Ways to Get Great Service Every Time

Making Resolutions Count

Bob Proctor on Goals for 2001

Keep Your New Years Resolution

Celebrate 2001 Every Day -- For a Year

Winter Weather Advisory

How to Really Enjoy A Snow Day

Learn & Grow Homepage

live&love

follow your heart
follow your dreams
follow your bliss

learn&grow

be curious
be challenged
be brave

body&soul

your mind
your strengths
your limits

givingback

do good
do the right thing
do unto others

reach for the stars

star secrets
star search
star clubs

Let's Shop!

to myself as an individual: to continue taking care of myself by eating right and exercising, by being completely true to myself emotionally and spiritually, to love myself through the times when I feel completely unlovable. That's not something that can be resolved in one sentence; it's a project that requires a lifetime commitment. 🍀

-- Sarah Chauncey

PRINT

feedback | view credits | privacy policy | terms of use | © 2004 OneWorldLive. All Rights Reserved.